Izzi

Senior Communications and Engagement Officer

What does your role at the Commission entail?

As the Senior Communications and Engagement Officer, it's my role to develop communications materials and external-facing content for the Commission. This includes managing our social media and website, along with speaking to external stakeholders and media.

Why are you passionate about working at the Commission?

Being responsible for the Commission's external engagement means I speak to many different people and work on a variety of projects. The diversity of the content makes my role interesting and means I am constantly learning, which is why I'm passionate about working at the Commission. No two days are the same, keeping it interesting and enjoyable.

What does your day-to-day look like?

Daily work at Commission varies a lot in my role, given just how broad communications and engagement can be. Some days I may be drafting social media posts, speaking with journalists or other integrity agencies, or delivering training to community stakeholders. Other days I may be working on projects like the many communication resources on our website or writing briefs for senior executives.

Daily tasks can be particularly varied during large campaigns, like Corruption Awareness Week. Designing external-facing campaign content and social media posts are some of my favourite interests. They allow me to demonstrate my creativity, which I love!

What are you most proud of working in this role?

In the short time I have worked at the Commission, I have been part of many exciting projects that I'm proud to say I have contributed to. Assisting my colleagues with writing the Commission's 2023 Annual Report was particularly notable and a task that taught me lots about the Commission and its work.
